

Packaging and Shipping Store Policies

A. Packaging tape for deliveries

1. This store was previously content to tape up people's return packages. However, after a while it became clear that not all customers appreciated the service and started expecting it, some even took advantage of it. For example, some customers expected the store to provide tape reconstructive surgery for mangled boxes! After a while, the store found itself paying a premium price per month for extra tape for customers that didn't bother to tape themselves. Customers assumed all the stores were the same and had similar policies, discounting that this particular store consistently receives a high-volume of returns. This forced the store to re-think its tape policies.
2. While the store doesn't mind applying a little piece of tape to boxes once in a while, the store would instead strongly prefer for customers to responsibly secure their boxes themselves. Every day, the store generously uses extra tape beyond what customer's apply to tape up their packages securely. The store doesn't want to see its customer's boxes to be structurally compromised but at the same time knows that given proper communication, customers can better shoulder the burden of securing their packages.
3. Since the store is franchise owned, it may have a different packaging policy than another similarly branded store, however each owner may be different. Hence each store may have a different policy and there's no guarantee of consistency across different stores.
4. Other big box stores such as clothing stores and office supply stores may use more tape for packaging deliveries or returns, but those policies are not set in coordination or in conjunction with the current said store.

B. Printing fees

1. If a customer has merchandise returns that require them to print out a printing label, they can email them to the store's email address. The store can print out the email for $5 or the customer is welcome to bring the label already printed out for easy drop-off. This is mainly a convenience fee. The local libraries have low-cost or no print fees as well.

C. Customer Phone behavior

1. If for whatever reason a customer needs to call a customer support line regarding their merchandise or returns, they can do so in the back of the store so as not block the counter and line area, especially more so, if the store is busy and also if they choose to use speaker phone. Any noticeable distractions can diminish the well-being and efficient service of the store.

D. Multiple packages

1. If a customer has a heavy item or multiple items where they need assistance to unload from their vehicle, they are free to schedule an appointment beforehand to help unload their packages with assistance from a store team member. For example an elderly lady may need help carrying a bigger box.
2. If a customer has exceeded 15 packages per visit in a day, they must re-enter the line (if one has a queue of other people) as to give other people in line equal service store access. They are also free to use another nearby location. This helps mitigate long lines at a single store because of bottlenecks around single customers with high delay - returning processing times.

E. Private Investigators

1. If it comes to the attention of the store that someone's identity has been compromised via a private investigator (not law enforcement), the store is under no obligation to work in co-operation with such an investigator unless it is through proper law enforcement channels. If a package is deemed to have a suspicious identity it is permissible to return such package back to the sender.

F. Network

1. Should the store computer systems or network fail to function properly, either due to a local or large scale outage, the store must pause certain operations. If the store is not able to process shipments and returns since both functions require accessing and updating remote networks and servers, it must notify customers. It is permissible for the store to inform customers that the system is temporarily down and to try back later.

G. Package Lookup

1. If the customer desires package location or lookup information, they can search on Google for such tracking lookup as the physical store doesn't have extra information beyond that.
2. Should a customer want to change the pick up location from their residence to a particular store, they can call the corporate toll-free customer service to arrange for store pickup. There is no need to physically stop by a local store for this information.
